Introduction

Mental health ensures the optimal completion of all life cycle stages by an individual and is characterized by structural and functional development, followed by the preservation of the basic mental functions. Law and legislation take into account the main provisions and achievements of psychiatry and related mental health sciences when solving the theoretical and practical problems they face. At the same time, psychiatry as a science and field of practical activity does not stagnate, it is actively developing, which may require adequate changes to the current legislation.

Nowadays many countries are undergoing a rethinking of the basic approaches to rendering various types of care to persons suffering from mental illnesses. New models of medical, social, educational and services are being introduced, which inevitably influences the legislation on healthcare, social security, labor and education.
